Contact ARL Department: Home Depot seeks partners for wayfinding systems May 12, 2012 The Department of Transportation has called on universities to take part in a multi-agency $3.5 million program through which a team of researchers will test ways of displaying traffic signs and signals in high-traffic areas such as airports and train stations. Doing so will improve traffic flow and cut congestion and accident rates, the department said. The program, which will launch in late 2012, is a partnership between the department and the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA), the Federal Aviation Administration, the Federal Railroad Administration, the Federal Highway Administration and the Federal Transit Administration. The wayfinding program's goal is to research ways to make Americans aware of routes and destinations through the use of visual information to enhance the way people interact with infrastructure in public spaces. The program also will focus on the safety issues associated with designing, building and maintaining these wayfinding systems. The testing of wayfinding systems will be based on information from three studies that included more than 120,000 people participating in 18,000 interviews. The researchers hope to test what kinds of signs are most effective for wayfinding, how signage should be laid out and what features make wayfinding systems effective. The tests also will look at what people want and expect out of a wayfinding system and how the design of wayfinding systems can make traffic safer. All of the testing will be done using eye-tracking technology. The researchers will track the movement 3e33713323
