Trauma care consultation: the impact of interdisciplinary team training. The provision of trauma care consultation (TCC) has become more widespread, but the evidence base for its impact is very limited. We hypothesized that TCC would improve both the decision-making process and clinical care among rural and community trauma centers. We conducted a randomized trial in 10 rural and two community Level 1 trauma centers in the Midwestern United States. The intervention involved an interdisciplinary team training including the surgical services and resident education. The primary outcome was the rate of surgical intervention. The secondary outcomes included interdisciplinary team practice change and clinical care. Data were analyzed using the chi-square test, t test, repeated measures analysis of variance, and generalized estimating equation model. The interdisciplinary team training was associated with a significant reduction in the rate of nonacute intervention (18.3 percent vs. 11.9 percent, P =.008) and the rate of non-urgent intervention (19.2 percent vs. 10.1 percent, P =.003). The intervention was associated with a significant practice change in trauma triage and assessment. There was a significant increase in the time spent delivering TCC, and confidence in TCC as a management strategy increased in the intervention group. Rural and community trauma centers have limited resources to deliver comprehensive trauma care. Interdisciplinary team training has a significant impact on the delivery of TCC, which may improve the overall efficiency of trauma care delivery. This trial was registered at www.clinicaltrials.gov (NCT00369451).The present disclosure relates to semiconductor devices, and particularly to a semiconductor structure, and methods of manufacture thereof, including one or more non-volatile memory devices. Numerous methods have been proposed to increase the programming speed of semiconductor memory devices. For example, one technique to increase the programming speed is adjusting the threshold voltage of a memory cell by lowering the temperature during a program operation. Another technique is the use of a so-called "self-boosting" scheme that includes performing a program operation in two steps, e.g., a pre-boosting step and a main boosting step. A voltage, which is higher than the voltage in the pre-boosting step, is applied to a word line to program a selected memory cell from an erased state to a programmed state in the pre-boosting step. A higher voltage than the voltage used in the pre-boosting step is applied to a word line in the main boosting step for
