Shockley, an inventor best known for the invention of the transistor, has been awarded the Nobel Prize in Physics "for his invention of the transistor." Shockley, 90, was born in California on November 6, 1917. He became interested in science in high school, after a teacher introduced him to physics. Shockley was fascinated by physical laws and believed that there would be practical uses for them. The impact of his work on modern technology is obvious: Without the transistor, Apple wouldn't have the same role in our lives. The first solid state electronics like the transistor were created in Shockley's laboratory at Bell Labs. However, it wasn't until he joined Fairchild Semiconductor in 1956 that he came up with the idea of the three-terminal transistor. He called this third terminal the "gate," and it was used to switch the on-off state of the transistor on and off. Shockley didn't invent the transistor but he came up with its fundamental design. The first transistor he designed, a tetrode, was invented by Jack Kilby and he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Physics for the transistor in 1956. Soon, the transistor became the basis of modern electronics. It revolutionized the ability to manufacture transistors cheaply and in huge quantities and formed the basis of a whole industry. In recent years, Shockley left Fairchild and founded the Silicon Valley Group in 1985, with the aim of commercializing his inventions. He worked on his last invention, "finite-state logic," in his final years. Shockley is survived by his wife, Evelyn, three children, and 10 grandchildren. Here's a summary of his life, as well as an overview of his achievements: 1917 Born in California 1928 Moved to Chicago, Illinois 1932 Graduated from the University of Illinois with a degree in electrical engineering 1939 Received his master's degree in electrical engineering at the University of California at Berkeley 1942 Began work at Bell Laboratories in Murray Hill, New Jersey 1946 War Department asked Bell Labs to create a simple device that would replace the mercury-switched relay, which was used to control the telephone exchange lines. The relay was controlled by a mechanical switch that was triggered by a magnet. Shockley invented the field effect transistor.
