Emotikon's - Press the button (F3) to insert a smiley.The U.S. company has worked with researchers at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) and the University of California, San Francisco to design, build and test a wireless temperature sensor that can communicate with a smartphone to monitor a patient's body temperature when that person is sleeping. The sensor, a sub-microgram wireless chip the size of a grain of rice, can detect temperatures up to 30 degrees C (86 F) from a meter away, and it can transmit temperatures reliably for eight hours. It also has an alert function that will let a user know if their phone is lost, and a software function that will send a notification if a temperature reading deviates from normal for too long. The sensors, which were developed by researchers at MIT and UC San Francisco, are integrated into a postage stamp-size structure called a ribbon array, which is attached to a flexible substrate. The sensor portion of the ribbon array is actually a diode. The sensor receives power from a battery that's enclosed in the printer cartridge of the printer, which turns on the diode and creates the current that powers the temperature sensor. The MIT researchers designed the sensor's diode to form a
