Erin In the 1800's, Erin was a small village in County Kilkenny, Ireland, and the location of an important battle of the Irish rebellion of 1803. In the early 19th century, it was a very popular place to visit, with thousands of people coming to see the annual fairs. It was described in 1819, as having population of some 4000. The village had a 17th-century Franciscan friary (monastery) and served as the main Catholic church for the area. The friary was damaged during the Irish rebellion in 1803 and was used as a garrison for the British army. It was the target of several raids by the rebels during the short-lived rebellion of 1798. The rebellion was crushed by the Royal Army at the battle of Vinegar Hill and many of the rebel leaders fled to Erin. The rebels laid siege to the monastery, but ran short of food and were forced to retreat. The battle, known as the Battle of Vinegar Hill, was the last rebellion in Ireland. The Anglo-Irish nobility and gentry were on hand in large numbers to watch the battle from high ground above the battlefield. They were forced to move for their own safety, and on the night of the battle, the Fitzgeralds (Irish nobility) had their encampments destroyed and left a burnt-out ruin of their former residence. The monastery was used by the British during their blockade of the town, until 1795, when the friary was closed, following a fire that had destroyed much of the town. Prior to that, it had been the monastery of an important Franciscan Order, and during the 1770's, it was turned into a soldiers' quarters. By 1819, the British garrison left the town, and the nearby Franciscan friary had been used as a military barracks. In the meantime, the building had been used as a factory by the order. The British military left after the rebellion in 1803, although they were active in the area until 1816. By the mid-19th century, there was little use of the village and it became a potato harvesting area for many farmers. The buildings that remain today are in a poor condition and have been abandoned for decades. In the 1950's, the Irish government used the area as a dumping ground for large quantities of asbestos.
