Identification of liposome-encapsulated HIFU therapy after silica implants: A histopathological and biochemical approach ... This places an emphasis upon the importance of effective cellular repair mechanisms in the process of healing and tissue reconstruction in the face of a potential hazard from surgical implants. This prompted the research of non-invasive and minimally invasive methods for eliminating implanted foreign particles and healing defects at the cellular and molecular level. In recent years, cellular therapy including the induction of autologous stem cells and growth factors for tissue repair has evolved and been optimized to yield the greatest clinical results in the absence of risks and adverse effects. A various of stem cell engineering techniques have been attempted as a potential solution
